EXTRAMURAL GRANTS:

PI. Gates Foundation. Movements, Markets and Transnational Networks: Feminist Protest and Women's Economic Empowerment Worldwide. $449,005 (2017-2019).

> This project develops a global database of domestic and transnational women's movements and organizing. It explores the relationship between such organizing and women's economic rights, comparing them to other areas of women's status.

PI. American Jewish World Service. Women's Protest Activity in the Global South: A Study of Feminist Movements in Africa, Asia and Latin America. $29, 945 (2017-2018).

PI. Mellon Foundation. Breaking Through: Developing Multidisciplinary Solutions to Global Grand Challenges. $750,000 (2016-2019).

> This project develops a unique approach to research, scholarly publishing and communication on global grand challenges. The approach is unique in two ways. First, it catalyzes the involvement of humanists and social scientists in grand challenges research, innovation and policy formation. Next, it embeds publishing professionals, libraries faculty and policy experts in the scholarly communication process. The program enables broadly interdisciplinary teams to tackle grand challenges in new ways, with expert assistance in communicating results directly to the public and key stakeholders (policymakers, not-for-profit organizations, and others), so that new research gets more swiftly into the hands of people who need it. For the project webpage see: https://www.purdue.edu/breaking-through/index.php

PI. National Science Foundation, Political Science Program. Workshop: Informal Institutions as Solutions to Intractable Global Problems (with Leigh Raymond, Dan Kelly, Ann Marie Clark, and Ximena Arriaga). $37,000. (2012)

This workshop convened an international, interdisciplinary group of scholars to synthesize work on informal institutions and norms across disciplines in order to illuminate new solutions to intractable global problems, focusing on food security, climate change, and women's human rights. For more information (including webcast) see http://www.purdue.edu/discoverypark/intractableproblems/

PI. National Science Foundation, Political Science Program. States and Sex Equality: Why Do Governments Promote Women's Rights? $237,000 (2006-2011); Supplemental grant of $42,000 awarded (2009-2011) (with Mala Htun).

This project develops a new theoretical framework to explain why national governments adopt different types of sex equality policies through multi-country fieldwork and the creation of an original cross-national dataset. This dataset covers six policy areas in 70 countries representing all world regions, levels of development, and degrees of democracy from 1975 to 2005. Fieldwork was conducted in China, Israel, India, Nigeria, Malaysia and Argentina. This research formed the basis for a book manuscript, six articles and a book chapter and for presentations in many venues including Emory, Harvard, Cornell, University of Chicago, Notre Dame, Center for Women Development Studies (New Delhi) and UNIFEM. This research also forms the basis for two background papers, one for the World Bank's 2012 World Development Report and another for UNWomen's The World's Women. The supplemental grant funds research on social movements.

PI. Canadian Studies Faculty Research Grant, Government Policy on Violence Against Women in Canada. Government of Canada. $5,000. (2002)

WORKS IN PROGRESS

Diversity and Inclusion: Implications for Science and Society (Articles, Grant Proposals, and possibly a Handbook). This project investigates conceptual and empirical questions related to the barriers and opportunities involved in advancing diversity and inclusion in science, business, government and civil society. This project involved several interdisciplinary research teams. An inaugural symposium at which concept papers and research plans were presented to an interdisciplinary team of scholars took place in April 2014, another two such symposia on particular topics (social movements, science and organization) have generated additional interest, and a capstone symposium and final workshop on descriptive representation and environmental justice took place in 2016. This project has produced a book proposal, several grant proposals, several conference papers and a book chapter so far, but the research in this stream is on-going.

Inclusion and Solidarity in Social Movements (Research and Writing in Progress). This project examines the dynamics of inclusion and solidarity in social movements. One part focuses on transnational social movements, comparing the global movement on gender violence, anti-sweatshop movement, and the global movement against racism in order to reveal different strategies for forging solidarity across diverse constituencies. What are the consequences of these different strategies for the representativeness of processes of international governance? This project also compares the efficacy of the resultant movements in terms of influencing governance and governments. Another part of this project uses Twitter data as well as traditional techniques of social movement research to examine a variety of social movements, including the Black Lives Matter movement, Anonymous, and Say Her Name, to examine how social movements build solidarity in the context of dissent and difference. One (award-winning) paper from this project has been published in Perspectives. This project currently involves collaboration with several colleagues in political science and sociology, and involves several graduate students, including my advisees Fernando Tormos and Kaitlin Kelly-Thompson. For more information on this collaborative project and working papers see the links on my webpage (www.laurelweldon.com). Current working papers from this project include:
